The Impact of Community-Based Education: A Story in Three Acts

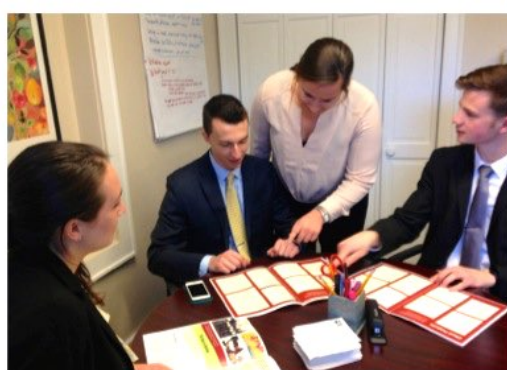

David Scobey is a Professor of the Humanities at the New School in New York City. He has previously served as Executive Dean of the New School for Public Engagement from August, 2010 through June, 2014. His scholarship spans across a variety of disciplines such as politics, culture, urbanism, and space in nineteenth-century America. This scholarship and engagement focuses on Gilded-Age New York. Please welcome him in his keynote speech on the impact community engaged scholarship can have.

The Community Challenge Grant asks community-based organizations to work with Siena Faculty to explore a multifaceted research question posed by a community partner. This year's Grant is looking at the issue of food access and food security in the Capital Region. Siena Faculty will be collaborating with Siena students, nonprofit organizations, government organizations, and several local counties to produce data on this problem within the Capital Region. The project will span across three years, with the end goal of creating a Food Access Committee within our community.
